Congress of the United States Washington, DC 20515

September 8, 2005

The Honorable Michael Chertoff Secretary United States Department of Homeland Security Washington, DC 20528

Dear Secretary Chertoff:

As we begin the long recovery from Hurricane Katrina and the flooding of New Orleans, we are writing to urge you to ensure that the federal government devotes the necessary resources to the psychological casualties of this unprecedented disaster.

As many Members of Congress, numerous experts, and many within the Administration have recognized in the context of the war in Iraq, extreme stress and trauma can have a profound impact on individuals, in both the short- and long-term. If combat and the chaos of war can disable even those who are trained for battle, imagine the fallout of the last week's events -- especially on higher-risk populations such as those who have suffered previous traumas or have pre-existing mental illnesses. Science has shown us that while most people have the resiliency to recover and move on after significant trauma, others have biological reactions in their brains that force them to continue experiencing the heightened emotions long after the trauma has passed. This reaction is not a sign of weakness, but a disease of the brain that is treatable, especially when treated early.

Research has also shown that the sustained effectiveness of first responders, clean-up crews, and even mental health providers themselves will depend on carefully structuring the environment and making available interventions under the direction of appropriate experts. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention gained valuable experience in developing appropriate mental health supports for relief and recovery workers involved in the Indian Ocean tsunami in January. After the Oklahoma City bombing in 1995, divorce rates, alcoholism and drug abuse rates, and domestic violence all spiked among first responders. We owe it to the heroes on the Gulf Coast to keep them safe not only from undue physical risk, but from preventable brain disorders.

Brain disorders such as post-traumatic stress disorder are frequently overlooked as emergency responders contend with more highly visible challenges. Yet the brain disorders have the capacity to cause life-long disability and death by suicide or reckless behavior years after the official disaster relief efforts have ended. In fact, research shows that these disorders frequently appear months after the initial trauma.

As you coordinate the federal response, we strongly urge you to make the treatment and prevention of brain disorders like PTSD a critical component of the relief efforts. At a minimum, we ask you to consider the following:

- How can the federal government help states and communities meet a surge in demand for mental health care by survivors of the hurricane and flooding, not just in the first months, but also over the longer term?
- Can the federal government, perhaps through the U.S. Public Health Service Commissioned Corps, coordinate displaced licensed mental health providers from the Gulf Coast to meet the demand for services for responders and victims?
- How can expertise from the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration, the CDC, the Center for the Study of Traumatic Stress at the Uniformed Services University of the Health Sciences, and elsewhere be brought to the months-long recovery and clean-up efforts to ensure the continued effectiveness and mental health of those involved?
- What steps will be taken to keep families and social networks intact as residents are relocated?

Thank you for your attention to these critical issues. We appreciate the complexity of managing the recovery of this horrific disaster and, like all of our colleagues, stand ready to help you and your Department meet the country's needs.

Sincerely,
